Jongsuk Yoon. Kumgangsán

On the occasion of its reopening, mumok has invited the artist Jongsuk Yoon to conceive a new mural for the museum lobby. After photo-based installations by Cindy Sherman, Louise Lawler, and Jeff Wall, the most recent artist to create a mural was Siegfried Zaworka, who in his work dealt with the illusionist potentials of painting. Jongsuk Yoon now responds to the challenge of the monumental format with levitating, wholly anti-monumental and anti-heroic landscape pictures. Reduced means and the processuality of painting govern Yoon's artistic practice, which she has developed in critical reflection of the paradigms of Western Modernism and East Asian traditions—particularly Expressionism, Abstract Expressionism, and Korean sansuhwa (Mountain and Water Paintings). Diaphanous layers of large-scale color patches, processual traces, and graphic ciphers condense to form panoramic "soul landscapes" (J. Yoon), in which "inner" and "outer" perspectives oscillate.

The title Kumgangsán (Diamond Mountain) not only serves as a reminder that Korean cultural and philosophical history is shaped by its relationship to the country's predominantly mountainous environment but also has an eminently political dimension. Kumgangsán is the painterly convergence on a mountain region that Yoon herself has never set foot on: Since 1945, it has been the arbitrary dividing line and visible border between North and South Korea and, as such, is a symbol of an unresolved geopolitical conflict and its still traumatizing aftermath.

Jongsuk Yoon was born in Onyang, South Korea, in 1965 and has lived in Europe since 1995. She studied at the universities of fine arts of Münster and Düsseldorf and at the Chelsea College of Art in London. Her works have been presented in numerous international exhibitions, including at Kestner Gesellschaft in Hannover; the Art Sonje Center in Seoul, South Korea; The Nordic Watercolor Museum in Skärhamn, Sweden; Museum Kurhaus Kleve; and Kunsthalle Münster. Yoon's works are part of many public collections, including those of Kunstpalast in Düsseldorf, the Zabłudowicz Collection in London, the Sprengel Museum Hannover, and the Darlene M. and Jorge M. Pérez Art Collection in Miami.
